GLOBAL FINANCIAL LINKAGES AND MONETARY POLICY TRANSMISSION

Special issue: Journal of International Money and Finance

Banque de France, Paris

30 June 2017

The Banque de France (BdF), the International Banking Research Network (IBRN), the Paris School of Economics (PSE), and Deutsche Bundesbank, organize a conference on 30 June 2017 to take place at the Banque de France headquarters in Paris. The goal of the conference is to present state-of-the-art empirical and theoretical research on international monetary policy spillovers as well as to provide a forum for the dissemination of the research results of the IBRN.

During the morning sessions, the IBRN's country teams will present their findings on the cross-border spillovers of conventional and unconventional monetary policies. The afternoon will feature presentations on international monetary policy transmission and related topics.

Conference papers will be invited for inclusion in a special issue of the Journal of International Money and Finance. The papers submitted to the journal's special volume will go through an expedited refereeing process and will be subject to the same requirements as standard submissions.

We invite theoretical and empirical research, preferably using micro or other specialized datasets, related to identifying and measuring monetary policy spillovers. Topics of special interest include (but are not restricted to):

- Macroeconomic effects of monetary policy across national borders
- International transmission channels of conventional and unconventional monetary policy, with particular focus on bank lending and portfolio rebalancing channels
- Effectiveness of domestic prudential instruments in offsetting foreign monetary policy spillovers through banks
- Implications of global financial linkages and the global financial cycle for the real economy and international monetary coordination

Authors should send their papers by 15 April 2017 to the following email address:
